For five or more miles outside of Chino the moist land is so rankly rich that it exhales an cxlor resembling that of a full-fledged city dump. Weeds grow to be almost trees, and it is dangerous to leave your cane sticking in the ground--twill sprout. However, were the writer an agriculturist, he would prefer a little inferior grade of soil, minus the perfume. In the vicinity of this gigantic sweetening concern 7000 acres of beets--not ordinary beets; sugar beets are white--were set out last spring and bought by the company. With the factory as a never failing market, beets are a very profitable crop for Chino ranchmen. One of the several new California beet sugar factories is at Los Alamitos, not far from the...
