Our age can hardly claim to be of that rare number which displays the ripe or rotten product of former periods. It is clearly transitional, bridging the space between the un-original and unrighteous; respectability of the last century and-what? The answer to the weighty question contained in this last monosyllable may perhaps be in no wise more approximately answered than by an examination of the seed-thoughts and seed-books of the present. Our literature maintains its character as the index of the age in nothing more; completely than in its transitional nature. Never was there less fixity in the canons of criticism or stability in the popular taste. The style which yesterday was the keynote and model, to-day is obsolete, and meets with no mercy. Schools of philosophy, of science, of poetry, of fiction, and of criticism, succeed and obliterate each other like waves of the sea. If anywhere we might expect maturity, it would be in writing up the history of the past. But in less than a century we have had the Gibbonian, the Macaulayan, the Carlylean, the Grotean and the Motleyan eras, not to speak of the iconoclastic school of Niebuhr. Each of these, and more than we can mention, were hailed at their advent as the perfect historical methods till the next supplanted it in the popular admiration. The fact is, that each has revealed and supplied some deficiency in its predecessors, and has...
